WSJ Editor-in-Chief Tells Davos Elites 'We No Longer Own The News'

During a discussion titled 'Defending Truth,' The editor-in-chief of The Wall Street Journal admitted to Davos elites that the legacy media no longer 'own the facts' and people are much more likely to question what they report as truth.

Emma Tucker told a crowd at the World Economic Forum, "I think there's a very specific challenge for the legacy brands, like the New York Times and like the Wall Street Journal."

She continued, "If you go back really not that long ago, as I say, we owned the news. We were the gatekeepers, and we very much owned the facts as well."

"If it said it in the Wall Street Journal, the New York Times, then that was a fact," Tucker further stated, adding "Nowadays, people can go to all sorts of different sources for the news and they're much more questioning about what we're saying."

During the same discussion, Věra Jourová, Vice-President of the European Commission, complained about the rise of 'disinformation' being a "security threat," noting "It was part of the Russian military doctrine that they will start information war, and we are in it now."

"Disinformation is a very powerful tool," Jourová continued, adding that "In the EU we are focusing on improving of the system where the people will get the facts right. We don't speak about opinions. We are not correcting anyone's opinions or language. This is about the facts."

As we highlighted earlier in the week, Jourová has spent her Davos time meeting the heads of the likes of YouTube and Meta and ensuring they "play by the rules," while her boss, Ursula von der Leyen called for overarching globalist control over the flow of all information in the digital age.
